

"Wisdom is more precious than rubies, and nothing you desire can compare with her". You can store your business wisdom in your computer systems, below is an example; codenamed Exonet.

Terrabase recently presented the Exonet exotic fuels retailer network concept to; the bio-fuel producers of Wales, DEFRA and various industry bodies at the invite of the Welsh Assembly Government. Many thanks to them and the Cardiff Hilton for their hospitality.

The Exonet is a way to accumulate the wisdom and expertise of the exotic fuel producers into an Internet based computer system so that the whole market can operate as smoothly as possible.

What does this mean in reality?

Well, here's an example, the production of biodiesel creates an abundance of 'waste' plastic from the containers the oil is shipped around in. Many producers do not know there are companies who will take that waste plastic from them as a raw material for other production processes. The Exonet, however, does know this, so once a delivery of oil comes in, the companies who want plastic are instantly notified. Without further ado, the biodiesel producer has a buyer for their waste plastic.

This kind of knowledge is stored by the system so that the people involved in the various parts do not need to keep up with the best ways of dealing with the issues. The system is self-tuning, so as new innovations come along they can be programmed into it and everyone signed up to the network benefits.

With the right funding we hope to see Exonet implemented across the UK, linking together retailers, fuel producers, waste processors, waste oil producers etc. We will also apply an independently assessed quality and ethical standard so customers know the fuel will work well in their vehicles and is sourced in such a way as to minimise harm to people and the environment.

Is there expertise in your organisation that is not currently incorporated in your computer systems? Are your computer systems ad hoc, fragile or frustrating? Let us know and we'll come and do a free review.
